

How will Africa cope with its rising population challenges?

BBC News is broadcasting a week of special programming on Africa's rising population and the continent's strategies to cope with the population explosion which will see the population of Africa double to two and a half billion in just 30 years.

On a continent where nearly two thirds of people are already under 25, this vast new baby boom has the potential to provide a huge pool of workers ready to transform African economies, or the potential to create an even greater migration problem.

BBC Africa Correspondent, Alastair Leithead, has been investigating the potential of this “demographic dividend” in a series of special reports from across Africa.

For a week, beginning Monday, 21 August, BBC World News and BBC World Service will broadcast daily features within Focus on Africa, looking at matters such as the rapid urbanisation in Nigeria; the industrial revolution in Ethiopia; contraception in Niger; and food sustainability in Kenya.

From Monday, more information can also be found on bbc.com/africapopulation, including a written in-depth analysis, a series of short videos and additional features.

A special documentary, Africa's Population Explosion, will also broadcast on BBC World News (DStv 400) on Friday, 25 August and Saturday, 26 August.
