

How Netflix's new openness affects the advertising industry

 By Leslie Adams

18 Nov 2022

After years of cloaking its viewership statistics in secrecy, Netflix recently announced that it would join the UK's Broadcast Audience Research Board (Barb), Integral Ad Science (IAS), Nielsen and DoubleVerify.

Source: www.unsplash.com

These moves, which confidently demonstrate a commitment to greater transparency, will finally allow a clearer picture of its true influence among audiences.

Yet for the rest of the world, this has major significance too. This about-turn will – for the first time – allow the streaming platform to be measured and audited alongside live TV by an independent third party.

I would like to share four things that advertisers need to know about this landmark move – and what it means for the category at large.

Why is Netflix now moving towards more transparency?

We are now entering the age of transparency and measurement.

Previously, Netflix and other streaming services were primarily concerned with growing their subscriber base. This shift indicates that the category is starting to understand that this base will – and is already starting to – plateau, and advertising spend will become an important driver in its next phase of revenue growth.

With this in mind, it becomes that much more important for the category to offer independently-audited viewership and subscriber metrics; knowing how integral these are to marketers in their advertising budget allocations.

What is the difference between how live TV and streaming platforms are measured?

The National Association of Broadcasters (NAB) Audience Measurement report says, “Audience measurement...allows advertisers to understand viewing patterns allowing informed decisions to be made on where to place advertisements to reach the correct target audience at the lowest cost.”

While there are several methods, one of the most common ways TV audiences are measured is via the Broadcast Research Council (BRC) Television Audience Measurement (BRC Tams).

This system uses ‘peplemeter’ technology; a tool that measures the viewing habits of TV audiences. Commissioned through BRC’s research supplier, Nielsen, this data is released daily via media planning software tools.

On the other hand, streaming services, which are digital at their core, will be able to offer advertisers more granular data, revealing a deeper, more detailed picture of viewership patterns, audience profiles, preferred viewing times as well as viewership duration.

Telkom hands over its video and audio streaming platform to SABC

16 Nov 2022

How is live TV impacted by Netflix's move?

Streaming services have always maintained that they are more like TV than digital video or social media.

These latest moves signal that Netflix intends to compete directly with traditional TV for adspend, by measuring audience size as an “Audience Rating” – the holy grail of TV measurement metrics.

With increased transparency, its campaigns can now be measured alongside TV buys, while having the added advantage of being able to more accurately profile and target audiences, as with digital channels.

What does this mean for advertisers?

There are four main implications:

- There will be more impressions available to purchase than ever before, resulting in clear adspend winners and losers
- The line between digital and traditional will become increasingly blurred; meaning that agencies and marketers will require both digital and traditional media skillsets to design more effective and holistic, integrated strategies
- The move towards shared measurement will speed up, now that streaming services and traditional TV are competing on the same playing field
- Streaming will make TV buys smarter and more precise. In time, this will introduce more attributed sales to TV spend

Leslie Adams is the sales director at Reach Africa

- Investing in hot local content makes business sense - 30 Aug 2023
- The evolution of TV viewing - 8 May 2023
- Load shedding is killing prime time television - 20 Mar 2023
- How Netflix's new openness affects the advertising industry - 18 Nov 2022

View my profile and articles...

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>