Juan Mouton, portfolio director for the summit noted the following, "The African retail, tourism and financial markets have taken huge leaps forward in customer experience over the last six years and as the market matures and investment in CX continues to grow, being able to show a quantifiable return on investment that is linked to business metrics is becoming a critical requirement."

He goes on to mention, "Technology plays a huge role in being able to leverage actionable insights on the enormous amounts of data that is collected along the customer journey. The major stumbling point for most organisations is understanding how to extract value from that data, and redeploy those insights to inspire an emotional connection with the consumer that leads to real business results that reflect on the bottom line.

"That is what this year's summit will aim to tackle and together with industry leaders and our partners we are sure that everyone attending the summit will leave with the ability to create a business led customer experience strategy."

Commenting on the theme of the conference and the importance of being able to extract value from data, Magers said, "It is definitely a challenging competency for organisations in general. But, CX professionals are in the unique position to bring together the data and understand the right problem to solve using design thinking and insight generation techniques. It is teaching the organisation what the data means and, not only what they can do with it (with a CX professionals guidance), but also why it is important to leverage the information."

She continued: "It's incumbent on CX practitioners, analysts and business units to work closely to discover the right opportunities from across the enterprise based on the customer's journey and present a credible and cohesive picture of insights, the holistic solution approach and the results."
